

On Nov. 28, 1812, eighty-two American seamen under Sailing Master Samuel Angus and one hundred and fifty soldiers under Capt. King made an attack on the British batteries on Niagara River, opposite Black Rock. The seamen and soldiers charged with great spirit, in spite of a galling fire, and in a short time put the British to flight and captured a large number of prisoners, including the English commander. The British spiked their guns and hurled them into the river. In the confusion a number of the Americans were left behind after the main body had returned to their boats, and the British, having reformed, captured Capt. King and a few soldiers. In this affair the Americans had twenty killed and wounded, while the loss of the English was considerably greater. It was in this assault that John Hodges Graham, afterward a Commodore in the United States navy, lost a leg. Midshipman Thomas Holdup Stevens, the father of Rear Admiral Stevens, also was shot through the hand, and Midshipman William Merwine, afterward Rear Admiral in the United States navy, received a musket ball in his thigh.

It was on Nov. 28, 1863, that a Confederate force of about 20,000 men of Longstreet's corps attacked the Union troops under Gen. Burnside, who was defending Knoxville, Tenn. Some weeks before Longstreet had driven Burnside into Knoxville and besieged the place. Several sharp attacks were made in the progress of the siege, notably that on the Union right, held by the 112th Illinois, the Forty-fifth Ohio, the Third Michigan, and the Twelfth Kentucky regiments. The Confederates carried a hill, but did not secure any material advantage, although inflicting a loss of about a hundred men on the defenders. For ten days the Confederates maintained a monotonous shelling and skirmishing. On Nov. 28, having been reinforced by Sam Jones and one or two other detachments from Virginia, Longstreet made a heavy assault. A picked storming party of three brigades attacked an unfinished but important work known as Fort Sanders, on the Union left. The Fort was defended by Gen. Ferrero, who succeeded in repelling the Confederates after a desperate fight. In this assault Longstreet lost about 500 men, while on the side of the Unionists the loss was about 100, only 15 of these being in Fort Sanders. After this repulse Longstreet was compelled to abandon the siege by the approach of a strong force under Gen. Sherman, and he retreated rapidly into Virginia. The entire Union loss in the defence of Knoxville was about 900 men, while the Confederates must have lost two or three times that number.
